Medicine and civilization: The role of medicine in population control and civilization building from the dawn of civilization until the present time

Medicine has always been inextricably linked with politics and has served power in noble and insidious ways to accomplish the hidden goals of the fundamental laws of civilization building, laws that have never been written down and constitute not only the most important knowledge but also the deepest and most closely guarded secret of the highest echelon of power. Now that the fundamental laws of civilization building and the population control objectives they entail have been exposed, a reorientation of medicine is required to reestablish the public's trust in the profession, cleanse it of the subversive influence of global politics and the machinations of organized religion, and change the relationship between medicine and society.
